

Creating Microservices for account and loan

A microservice is a small, independent application that performs a specific business function and communicates using REST APIs. In this exercise, two Spring Boot microservices were created: an Account Service and a Loan Service. Each service is developed as a separate Maven project with its own configuration and dependencies. The Account Service provides account information through the endpoint `/accounts/{number}`, while the Loan Service provides loan details through `/loans/{number}`. Since both services run independently, they must use different ports. The Account Service runs on the default port 8080, and the Loan Service is configured to run on port 8081 using the `server.port` property. Splitting functionality into separate microservices improves modularity, scalability, maintainability, and allows each service to be developed, deployed, and updated independently.
